Knowing that Crypto-currency has grabbed a substantial portion of discussion in legal discourse due to its all-pervading nature. It becomes of much interest to explore the technology underlying it and take a stock of its legal-economic implications, the initial growth of crypto-currency was seen as a libertarian move against the centralized market fall of 2008. The 2008 economical crisis across the globe, saw people losing out trust in centralized banking system, and shifting to a more peer-to-peer transactions, which lead to the consolidation of blockchain technology. Ever since then usage of crypto-currencies has only increased. However, many of the centralized banking sectors across the globe have reflected a resistance against this digital revolution due to its volatile nature and uneven regulating mechanism. Yet, with consolidate growth every year, a substantial market economy has functionally accepted crypto's as a part of their exchange system. Further, Governments across the globe have shown predilection towards Blockchain Technology, but not so against Crypto's.
